Supportive housing services

Pronouns: she/her/hers

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Being a black woman myself, I want to see myself and other people of color, represented, empowered, protected, and advocated for. Racial equity is key in this work and every aspect of our community and if we are truly here to advance communities of color, to that of our white counterparts, we need to radically push into more spaces.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

Being a part of this board gives me hope that I will be able to honestly and frequently share the expectations of my unhoused neighbors around service delivery and policies long held that should be rewritten. In the next two years, I want to strengthen and empower our houseless community and unite our service providers to increase efficiency. Most importantly, I'm excited to learn and broaden my view on what is possible.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity matters to me because I believe in the inherent equal value of every human being. We've seen and continue to see the unspeakable impacts of racism in our country and I believe that a proactive anti-racist approach is necessary. We can all learn so much from one another in humility and in our lived experiences, walking through life in different shoes. Diversity, equity, and inclusion is critical work that is essential and beneficial to all involved. When making complex decisions regarding supportive housing services and planning, we must take into account how systemic racism has led to disproportionate rates of houselessness amongst the BIPOC community. Therefore, we must have equity and inclusion of the BIPOC community to inform best practices and lead in equitable decision-making.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I am so honored and excited to serve on the Metro Supportive Housing Services Tri-County Planning Body. I am a licensed clinical social worker and have previously worked as a counselor and case manager for youth and young adults experiencing houselessness in Portland. I also directed advocacy efforts for a large coalition of nonprofits serving houseless communities in Los Angeles, working to elevate the voices of those with lived experience to policy-makers and contributing to the city's plan to end homelessness there.

I believe we are currently facing a humanitarian crisis in the tri-county region with the number of individuals and families experiencing houselessness and housing insecurity. There are so many factors involved and I believe that it will take intentionally collaborative efforts to address the complex systems and the multi-faceted needs of a diverse population of those experiencing houselessness and those struggling to maintain or find affordable housing. In one of my current roles, I regularly meet with nonprofit service providers, those with lived experience of houselessness, faith communities in the tri-county area hoping to serve vulnerable people in the community, and with elected officials to discuss these issues. As I meet with them I am trying to identify what is working well and what barriers exist, and what's not working, with the hope of identifying actionable steps forward. I hope to humbly bring these voices to the table as we meet and I hope to serve our community well.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Housing and Stabilization Services should be accessible to every human in the town, county, or state that wants to access them. Systematic change is what is going to have to happen for equality to become a reality. Racial equity is at the forefront in designing these programs. We are in a time of change. We are in a time when our voices matter. We are in a time to do something about skin color being a barrier to basic needs. All living breathing people deserve a place to call home that is safe, sanitary, and affordable. Now is the time!

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I am grateful for the chance to sit at the table with people in a position to make these programs better. My voice comes from a place of lived experience. I have been that person we are trying to give a fair chance to. I couldn't access any services as a single female that didn't have custody of my children. Participants come with so many barriers of their own. We need a system that breaks them down, not adds more on top of them. I hope my opinions can be used in a way that helps our communities stand stronger and to see each other through an equity lens. Better Together.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Achieving racial equity is essential for both the success of the Supportive Housing Services initiative and for advancing the moral imperatives of our community. The importance of pursuing racial equity begins with understanding and acknowledging how deeply embedded and structural it is in our society, including Oregon's racist history. So for me step one is shining a light on the issue and making it a part of each consideration and decision the TCPB makes. Also, I am guided by the work of the Schott Foundation on justice and equity. They point out that centering on equity, especially racial equity, requires structuring and monitoring the systems of justice (social and criminal) that create or undermine equity. TCPB is not a service provider, but it is uniquely positioned to monitor the regional structures that will enable those working directly with the houseless to be more aware and more effective at understanding and addressing their needs. I believe a focus on systems of justice as a means of advancing equity applies both to racial justice and to the experience of being homeless.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

Houselessness is our region's most urgent crisis, devastating the lives of our most vulnerable neighbors and even threatening the viability of our communities. I believe the SHS has the potential to solve this crisis and the TCPB can play a material role in doing so. SHS funds major housing resources and a continuum of services to address the causes of houselessness for each individual and provide genuine solutions.

However, having run organizations with large data systems that required integration of data, I know how hard that task can be. As a first step, we need to ensure we have quality from our service providers reporting to the Homeless Management Information System (HMIS) that we can better analyze with Built for Zero (BFZ). Then, to successfully regionalize a solution, we need to bring in other information from healthcare, criminal justice, and other sectors that are impacting people who are homeless. Crucially, we must do this while respecting the privacy and dignity of those we are seeking to serve.

I was a co-founder of New Avenues for Youth and am very familiar with the issues facing at risk youth, which affect the houseless of all ages. As a board member of All Hands Raised, I helped transform it into a convener of education services that emphasizes DEI and racial justice. As CEO of Northwest Evaluation Association (NWEA) I conceived and funded the Multnomah Education Research Partnership among NWEA, the University of Portland, and all the public schools in Multnomah County, which focuses on the most effective programs to help our most struggling students. I want to apply my experience and expertise in large scale systems change, and commitment to justice in order to address our current crisis. To me, that opportunity to help is exciting.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

At age 16, I entered the criminal justice system through McLaren Youth Correctional Facility. From 1987 until 2005, I spent nine years incarcerated, each time released without any support services or assistance. Finally, in 2005, I was released to a reentry program in Washington County. I navigated my newfound recovery with the help of a peer recovery mentor, addictions treatment, and supportive housing. For the first time, I experienced wrap-around services and their effectiveness. I have sustained his long-term recovery since March 3, 2003, celebrating 19 years of recovery this past March. Throughout my journey, I have seen the impact of the war on drugs, specifically on people of color, from an overfilled prison system to stretched resources for under-served communities and systemic racism within institutions. Where doors have opened for me, I have seen them close for other people based on their intersecting identities. As a result, I have dedicated my life to working in housing, addictions, and mental health, focusing on changing the structurally embedded systems with white supremacy.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I have worked in different capacities throughout my career, from a peer mentor in 2008 to my current role as the CEO of Bridges to Change today. I have worked alongside individuals to ensure they have the tools to succeed in recovery, including treatment, housing, mentorship, job development, and community support. I am enthusiastic and excited to serve as a part of TCPB because it is a group actively seeking change for the communities that need it the most. TCPB is working to create a community where resources are available to all communities, not just the most privileged. I believe contributing my voice of lived and professional experience can provide insight and perspective in many areas. I also believe in my commitment to social justice and working from an anti-racist framework; I will be a champion of supporting and contributing to solutions generated by our most impacted community members. I am inspired to help create lasting change.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

At Health Share of Oregon, we partner with communities to achieve ongoing transformation, health equity, and the best possible health for each individual. As an organization, racial equity work is essential to achieving our mission. As the leader of this organization as well as personally, racial equity matters to me a critical path forward to ensure a better place for everyone and that fewer people are left behind. This is and has been a lifelong commitment for me.

At Health Share, I am helping to lead as we take a new, equity-centered approach to our work, decision-making, strategies, and funding priorities. We are applying a racial equity tool to all our work to identify how current structures and systems create barriers to certain communities which show up as differential access, health outcomes, and so on. Over the years, I have learned that doing things “on behalf” of communities, while well intentioned, can have unintended consequences. So, both personally and professionally, I approach all our work as being guided by individuals and their communities. It is crucial that we address racial equity in this process.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I am excited to serve on the Tri County Planning Body because it aligns clearly and directly with my professional experience and personal dedication to the issues being addressed. I hope to pull from my experiences as a bilingual primary care provider that worked mostly with patients that preferred Spanish over English. My time working with and being guided by a patient majority board and my time working in different settings like CareOregon, Kaiser, and Health Share have helped me become comfortable working with a diverse group through decision-making. I would support and advocate for shared decision making about the work and services that are guided by our communities and the individuals we aim to support. I would speak up when needed and remain an active listener when needed as well. The housing needs are great in our communities, and I believe we will only get to a better place for these individuals and communities if we all can come together for this work and I am excited to work hard to develop and continue to grow the collaboration of this work across the counties, including health systems and Medicaid.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity matters to me because as a housing advocate I see how BIPOC communities are disproportionately impacted when trying to secure a roof over their head. I started organizing at the age of 14, I love serving all people, especially people of color, immigrants, refugees, and the Latino Community. I am driven by a passion for housing and social justice and the belief that everyone - regardless, of their income, disability, race, or immigration status - deserves a safe healthy place to call home. I have about 14 years of Senior Organizer experience, some of my strong skills are doing leadership development, community organizing, and multilingual-multicultural community engagement.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I am excited to be on the Tri County Planning Body because I believe I can represent the voices of a multi-ethnic, multicultural community that many times their voices are ignored, forgotten, or simply not on decision-making tables. Housing should not have borders and by working together we can make sure that programs, services, and well-established network support are equally lifted up in every region. All resources should be available to all communities regardless of where they live, work, worship, go to school, play, etc.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

My parents immigrated to this country in 1977 and I was the first person in my family born in the United States. I have always envisioned the United States as the land of opportunity! But, we must make sure that opportunity is available to all the people that make up our great nation. Portland is a very diverse city and I have worked with many talented people. That diversity is what makes our area of the country special. The diversity in opinions and ideas is what leads to growth as a society. You cannot have that environment without addressing the racial equity issues and we must ensure that there is a seat at the table for all the different voices in our community.

But along with opportunity, we need to make sure everyone feels included. We must work as a community to break down the walls and make sure we all are treated equally. With the origin of COVID-19 linked to China, I have noticed the rise in Asian hate in our community. As an Asian American living in the United States, it hurts me to see Asian Americans singled out because of the color of our skin. We are all Americans and we must all rally together to say this treatment of our neighbors is unacceptable. We have come a long way since my parents immigrated to this country but there is still work to be done.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

What excites me about the TCPB is that I have an opportunity to see this process through to the end! I was a member of the Here Together Coalition and I have spent a lot of time working with providers, government officials, and businesses trying to create a workable solution to some of the most challenging issues facing our community. Through this experience, I have learned so much about the process and potential landmines as we try to build on our current infrastructure.

The written framework of the bond measure and the work done by Metro and the counties has been a good starting point to address this crisis. But as we look to create a system for our houseless residents, we need to have the ability to hold everyone accountable and develop solutions for the whole region. Everything may start locally but if we truly want a lasting system, there needs to be a region-wide lens so the problem is not just moving from one jurisdiction to another. I am just excited to continue this journey to help our houseless members in our community. As a community, we have to find a better way to support our most vulnerable members and I hope the work we do with the TCPB will help create the model for other regions to follow.

Steve Rudman

Pronouns: he/him/his

County where you reside and/or work: Multnomah

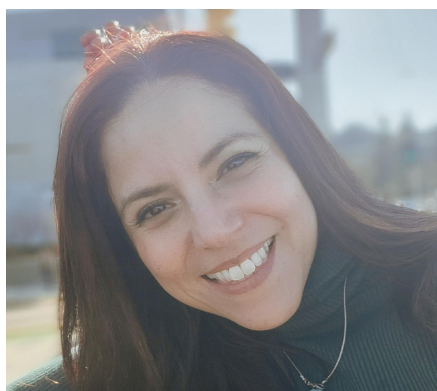

Steve Rudman's career spans over 35 years working locally in the affordable housing and community development field. He was Director of the City of Portland's Bureau of Housing and Community Development from 1993-2001 and Executive Director of Home Forward from 2001-14. Steve also served on the founding boards of numerous community-based organizations such as Portland Youthbuilders, Portland Housing Center, Proud Ground and REACH. Now retired, he currently co-chairs the Metro affordable housing bond oversight committee.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Steve is passionate about creating a strong nexus between new affordable housing opportunities and a reduction in homelessness. He also believes it's critical to address the racial disproportionality in our homeless population. With regard to regional policy and strategy development, he hopes we'll be intentional, support culturally specific services, and be willing to redesign systems to eliminate racial disparities.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

He believes our challenge is to "think outside of the jurisdictional silo box" and strengthen our regional supportive housing capacity with this funding. The aim should be to foster a culture of shared best practice, innovation, mutual accountability, and trust. He also hopes to seek creative partnerships and alignment with other systems of support, in particular behavioral health. Steve truly thinks the SHS initiative has the potential to be a game changer as it offers an extraordinary opportunity to combat chronic homelessness in our region with dedicated, flexible resources.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

I am from Ecuador. I moved to Oregon 19 years ago, but I didn't speak the language or understand the culture. I know firsthand how hard it is to get to know the different systems and the many barriers you can encounter while doing it.

My passion for being of service to the community allowed me to volunteer and work in different social services settings and for the last 8 years, I work in the Homeless and Housing Stability department at Community Action in Washington County. I have served my community and participants of programs by finding and supporting them with the best resources to accommodate their needs and/or housing stability needs. I identify and can name many of the issues people living in Oregon must navigate to find stability or thrive, including in the Immigrant, Refugee, BIPOC, LGBTQ+ communities. I am familiar with the issues in the many Systems of Care, in access, linguistics, bias, racism, Systemic racism, discrimination for many reasons, classism, regionalism, and housing discrimination with restrictive rules, regulations, policies, and eligibility criteria to name a few.

I recognized that structural race, gender, and inequities remain today, and they need to be named and addressed. Equity in service delivery is important! I want to be able to inform with that lens and focus on our integration with equity, as well as be able to provide good quality housing services to all.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I worked in the Coordinated Entry for Homeless Individuals at Community Action. I have done entry access, navigation, and supported the success of my community when they found a place, they can call home. I was also a Rent

Well student and a Rent Well Teacher. That knowledge has given me insights into the specific needs people living in Oregon have and how important is to listen to those needs. With the Supporting Housing services guided by regional goals, I see a great opportunity that will benefit our community.

Metro, Clackamas, Washington, and Multnomah counties are in my point of view, one big, beautiful city as we are all close by and share many commonalities. One person can live in one area, work in another, and have their social net or social support throughout all areas. For someone experiencing housing instability or homelessness, it is the same. I have met people who camp in one city one day and move to another city the next or spend the night on public transportation which allows them to have free breakfast in one city and lunch in another. We need collaboration, integration, sharing best practices, to know our participants and analyze our data among all of us to make sure we are advancing equity and providing opportunities and justice.

Yvette Marie Hernandez

Pronouns: she/her/hers

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I'm honored and excited to serve on the Tri-County Planning Body Committee. I believe we have an incredible opportunity to make an impactful change to the homeless crisis with the measure funds and advance racial equity as a united region. I'm passionate about ending homelessness and addressing racial equity because of my own lived experiences with discrimination, poverty, homelessness, and housing instability. I want to be a part of making a difference for our homeless neighbors – as they are counting on all of us to end the vicious cycle. Homelessness and housing instability is traumatizing – no one should have to experience this in their lives.

Why does racial equity matter to you?

As a brown woman, I'm working on unlearning and unpacking the whiteness I consumed through most of my life. In doing so, I've had to revisit my painful experiences of racism while simultaneously acknowledging that I must enter the conversation about race and racism from a place of racial privilege and understand that it's okay to feel discomfort. My anti-racism journey has been complex, insightful, and painful. Although revisiting my personal experiences can be emotionally exhausting – telling my story little-by-little brings forth awareness of the complexity of racism and healing to my heart. Though my lived experiences left scares, it made me a strong and resilient woman. Therefore, my goal is to build relationships, trust and center homeless communities of color, particularly, Black and Native Americans because of the historic and ongoing racism from slavery and violent land theft to continued housing discrimination. Housing is a human right!

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Advancing racial equity means we are closing the disparities in access to services and outcomes for people engaged in those services. The disparities are caused by community wide, long-trenched policies and practices; therefore, correcting these disparities is an act of justice, it's how we can actively live anti-racist principles and heal our communities from the long-term effects of racism. Knowing that many best practices were built with white providers for white clients, we need to take a data-driven and community centered approach to understanding what interventions work best for BIPOC clients specifically, and integrate that learning into the design of services, including funding and reporting structures. It's not just about getting input from communities most impacted; it's about designing systems to align with and invest in community's strengths. To truly improve the health and wellbeing of our communities we need to look for and evaluate these trends at a system level.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

While individual factors can impact a person's risk of experiencing homelessness, the primary drivers are systematic. The availability and accessibility of affordable housing, health care and living wage jobs ultimately determine if someone's risk factors will lead to homelessness, or if a community is resilient enough to maintain housing stability in the face of risk. It will take system integration, alignment and reform to make our communities more resilient and able to respond to homelessness, poverty and complex health needs. Given the Tri-County Planning Body's goals, this feels like the right place to center system level work that can improve the quality and quantity of community-based services. I have a passion for problem solving, and look forward to pairing a system level approach with a direct service lens. The impacts of poverty and housing instability are not contained by county boundaries. People work and live across the region and seek social support, health care and other resources that meet their needs. Continuity of care and consistency in quality of services is something the region should strive for, to ensure we are investing in healthy communities. While people may still travel for connections they want, it shouldn't be because their community lacks options. I think the challenges and the opportunities are one in the same. To make our community more resilient, we need to have common goals, strategies and investments that create a minimum standard of care.

Clackamas County Chair Tootie Smith

Pronouns: she/her/hers

County where you reside and/or work : Clackamas

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity is an important part of achieving a robust, community-driven process. My ideal is that voices from historically disadvantaged or marginalized groups are able to fully participate and share key information. Each perspective has value and brings new strategies, areas of concern and opportunities to light.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

The three counties are taking an important step to address housing and homelessness as a region. This is a robust group of stakeholders, business leaders, nonprofits and government leaders committed to the success of the Supportive Housing Services work. I am eager to see the innovative planning, cooperation and investment that will go into creating the TCPB Regional Plan. I would like to see efficiencies and strategies that create added capacity for shelter, housing and case management that translates directly into less people living on the street.

Sahaan McKelvey

Pronouns: he/him/his

County where you reside or live: Multnomah

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity matters deeply to me because I have seen the negative impacts of racial inequity both individually and collectively over the course of my life as an African American male. Growing up in Portland, Oregon has given me a very direct and close-up view of the oppressive impacts of societal racism and the many ways that this manifests itself in inequitable opportunities for my people. I see the disproportionate representation of African Americans who; live in poverty, who are incarcerated, who are involved with child welfare, who are unemployed, who are living without high school or college education, and who suffer from homelessness. None of these oppressive metrics are a secret, and none of these oppressive realities are unknown. And the fact that this reality for my people has not changed in centuries only highlights the equally disturbing reality that these conditions for African American people, across the U.S. but specifically in Portland, Oregon, have been purposefully and intentionally designed.

We live in a society that has been built on inequity for people of color, and specifically African American people. And in order to effectively address the inequities for our people that have resulted from centuries of oppressive institutional practice; then we must be equally as purposeful in dismantling these oppressive institutional practices as our society has been for centuries in building them. Racial equity matters to me because I have to do my part to contribute to dismantling this oppression on purpose.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I am excited about serving on the TCPB because this is an opportunity to contribute to seeing real and meaningful change in our region. We see the oppressive impacts of structural inequity in every sector of our society. But housing is a big deal, and the oppressive impact of a historical lack of access to housing for people of color is a tremendous wrong that we have a unique opportunity to make a little bit less wrong with the effective implementation of the SHS funds that were recently approved by our region voters.

Being able to help shape, measure, and actualize the long and short term impacts of these funds for community members who have been historically marginalized is not only exciting, it is meaningful and purposeful for me. This is an opportunity to contribute to taking steps as a region towards being a community that creates a level of access to housing that has never been a reality before for the communities of color that reside here.

Washington County Chair Kathryn Harrington

Pronouns: she/her/hers

County where you reside or live: Washington

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity matters to me because I grew up seeing the impacts on communities who have not had the same access to government services based solely on their skin color. It is vitally important that there be equitable access to services, and we make efforts to mitigate the generational impact of inequitable policies by pursuing programs that allow marginalized community members to flourish in Washington County. We must act to see that racial and ethnic identifiers are no longer a predictor of long-term health and economic opportunity.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

I have been a true believer in conquering regional issues since the late 1980's culminating in my 2007 – 2018 tenure as a Metro Councilor. Serving on this Tri-County Planning Body is the natural continuation of my efforts to see data driven positive outcomes to our region homelessness issue. As the Chair of the Washington County Board of Commissioners I am excited to participate in this body as it takes the next steps toward comprehensive regional efforts to address homelessness.

Commissioner Susheela Jayapal

Pronouns: she/hers

County where you reside and/or work: Multnomah

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Racial equity and social justice have been demonstrated as core foundations for how Susheela engages the world. As a woman, immigrant from South Asia, person of color, and an individual with working class roots, Susheela cannot separate the personal from the political. Through that lens, she understands that dominant systems work towards benefiting those with privilege.

Based on her experiences and through authentic relationships, Susheela knows that Black, Indigenous, and people of color are directly impacted by individualized and systemic racism, and all other interconnected forms of oppression. Susheela is invested to use her positionality in the collective effort to dismantle structural oppression, because racism, sexism, xenophobia, transphobia, heterosexism, ableism, and all forms of oppression, are linked.

Susheela has demonstrated her commitment to racial equity and social justice from early on as County Commissioner. As the devastating impacts from COVID-19 were revealed, she fought for data to better explain how communities of color were managing the pandemic, and for services that were culturally responsive in order to address their unique needs. She advocated for efforts to deliver focused relief to the most impacted communities, including the Oregon CARES Fund for Black Relief and Resilience, and the Oregon Worker Relief Fund. In response to homelessness, Susheela is not just looking to make rates of homelessness racially equitable, but is critically examining how policies and programs can maximize benefits for marginalized communities to move beyond the status-quo.

As a commissioner, Susheela understands that racial equity is essential if everyone is to have what they need to thrive. Changing systems and structures to achieve equity and justice for marginalized communities improves those systems and structures for all people. To get there, it means involving people most impacted by systemic inequities in the creation of new policies and programs. Commissioner Jayapal envisions a county and a region where everyone benefits from a more equitable and just system.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

With a vision for equity and justice, and a commitment to resolving a breadth of local issues, Susheela is honored to join the Tri County Planning Body as an elected leader to continue her efforts to address the local issue of homelessness and housing. While representing Multnomah County, she sees herself as a partner for the collective effort to move the needle on homelessness and houselessness in the region.

The homelessness crisis was one key motivator for Susheela to run for elected office in 2018. She understands that the crisis has deep and complicated roots that include the commodification of housing, the divestment of federal resources from affordable housing, and the growth of the Metro region without corresponding growth in available housing stock, all of which have combined to make the housing market vastly unaffordable and inaccessible.

She also understands that addressing the impacts of these systemic issues will require a regional approach. It will require a regional approach for data sharing and analysis, workforce development, capacity building for nonprofit organizations serving the houseless community, and much more. The Metro Supportive Housing Services Measure's inclusion of such an approach, through the Tri County Planning Board, is one of the most groundbreaking aspects of the measure, and Susheela is excited to be part of this work.

Lynn Peterson

Pronouns: she/her

County where you reside and/or work: Clackamas/ Tri-County

Why does racial equity matter to you?

Lynn Peterson is the President of the Metro Council, representing more than 1.7 million people around greater Portland. As Metro Council President, she has led efforts for the Metro Council to further support Metro's Strategic Plan to Advance Racial Equity, Diversity and Inclusion, including adoption of recommendations from Reimagine Oregon, support of the Albina Vision and its incorporation into the Rose Quarter project, and advancing reporting on equity measures in the council's work. These equity measures will create a stronger, more resilient economy in greater Portland and Oregon.

What excited you about serving on the TCPB?

Serving on the Tri County Planning Body will not only help guide the work of the voter-approved Supportive Housing Services program, it also will offer an opportunity to assess upstream causes of homelessness, using Metro's resources to help stop homelessness before it begins.
